H. G. Wells in one of his fantastic tales pictures the world of a distant future inhabited by creatures with huge, bulbous brains which by their furious cerebration have absorbed the vitality of the rest of the body and left man with a spidery foundation. These creatures do not walk at all. They simply sit and think. If Mr. Westorn has ever read the story he probably mistook it for a description of hell:

That part of Mr. Wells's prophetic picture which has to do with the huge, bulbous brains cannot get very far with a world which takes a good square look at itself this morning. But as to the gradual disappearance of legs, even of arms, he may very well be vigit.
